Employment information

Liaison Officers generally require excellent communication and negotiation skills.

The role of a Liaison Officer has a purpose beyond establishing and facilitating communication. They represent the employer by interacting directly with other organisations, community groups and individual members of the community by two-way communication to facilitate mutual understanding and/or negotiate agreement in order to achieve some action or purpose of the employer organisation.

The Liaison Officer has both an external role (reaching out and relating to others) and an internal role (relating to and reporting back to different sections of the employer organisation).

Whilst the description for this occupation focuses on community roles and governmental areas, VETASSESS would not necessarily require that this role be restricted to those areas. This role could be performed in a range of workplace settings, including the private sector.

A business liaison role is primarily to interact with other organisations to service the business interests of the organisation with the aim to foster the long-term success of the business. This differs from a Business Development role that has the primary purpose of coordinating sales and marketing activities.

A Customer Service role that is only required to provide support and advice to the business' customers would not be considered as highly relevant to Business Liaison Officer or at the required skill level.

A liaison officer in the community and welfare sector may work directly with individuals to determine their concerns or needs and take action to facilitate service delivery to them on one hand and provide feedback to the employer organisation about how its services and service delivery might be improved on the other.
