Employment information

Production Managers (Manufacturing) are employed for the purposes of planning, controlling and overseeing production activities in a commercial manufacturing setting, such as a factory or manufacturing plant.

Production Managers (Manufacturing) are generally expected to be working in large manufacturing establishments. They are expected to oversee the production processes in a mass production scale setting. Applicants working in the context of custom manufacturing may be considered on a case-by-case basis.

To obtain a positive skills assessment outcome, applicants are required to demonstrate employment within a business that is engaged in the production of commercial or consumer goods. As such, this occupation covers a wide variety of potential industries and work environments, including (but not limited to):

- Food and beverage processing.
- Automobile and vehicle assembly lines.
- Household appliance assembly lines.
- Electrical and electronic component manufacturing.
- Preparation of pre-fabricated construction materials.
- Production of chemicals and industrial goods.

Employment in a production management role within a forestry or mining operation is classified elsewhere in ANZSCO, and therefore cannot be deemed relevant to the Production Manager (Manufacturing) occupation.

As this is a managerial occupation, applicants must demonstrate that they have held a managerial or senior role within an organisation. Subsidiary roles such as production line labourers or shift supervisors will not be considered as meeting the managerial skill level required because they generally do not have a primary focus on strategic production planning and controls with authority over production activities.
